We at the UNC Charlotte Urban Institute are deeply saddened by the catastrophic impact of Hurricane Helene.

We are heartbroken to witness the destruction of so many places in our beautiful region. We are especially thinking of our Transportation Information Management System (TIMS) partners who serve our public school children and their families in every western county of our state. Many of our families, friends, and community partners are grieving, and we are hurting, too.

While the road to recovery is long and difficult to imagine right now, there are countless efforts underway to support our neighbors in need. It is both encouraging and remarkable to see residents lean into the power of community and come together to care for their neighbors. Our region is strong and it is special.

At the Charlotte Urban Institute, we are committed to providing reliable, data-driven information to help communities make decisions to enhance the quality of life for all people – and this includes in times of disaster and recovery. We are proud to focus whole-heartedly on the wellbeing of North Carolina and the people who live here.

We are with you. And we will get through this, together.

Looking to brighter days,
The UNC Charlotte Urban Institute
